Development of unemployed health services in the multiple constituency framework

Healthcare is one of the network partners supporting unemployed workability, and its expertise focuses on health and medical care. There has been little research on the development of health services for the unemployed (Saikku & Sinervo 2010; Lappalainen 2017). Development work has been done on different fronts. The purpose of this article is to evaluate the development of health care for unemployed people from the point of view of different actors in the multiple constituency framework. The material was collected within the TTP (Developing the Content and Structure of Health Services for the Unemployed) project, a subproject of the PARTY (Better work and operational ability) project funded by the European Social Fund and administered by the City of Rauma between 2015 and 2018. The TTP project was carried out by the Finnish Institute of Occupational Health. The evaluation material was qualitative and consisted of different perspectives. The evaluation criterion was practical because of the pragmatic nature of the subject. According to the results, the co-operation network of unemployed healthcare services operates on a random basis, and the intensification of cooperation and construction of permanent structures are needed. A key development objective is comprehensive information co-ordination and the development of client-oriented co-operation. The role of the client is central, and he/she must be involved in his/her own process.
